

tain specific allegations of fact sufficient to show that the petitioner is a party in interest and that a grant of the application would be prima facie inconsistent with" the public interest.

NAB said the commission should adopt guidelines and procedures to assure compliance with that provision. Such an action, it said would make for more efficient use of the commission's resources by "discouraging spurious or defective pleadings."

Among its recommendations, NAB calls for a sharper distinction between petitions to deny and informal objections (and the commission should consider defective petitions as informal objections "only to the extent they raise substantial and material questions of fact and by stating what those questions are"), standards for determining what constitutes standing as "a party in interest" and a limitation on the number of pages that a petition to deny may contain.

As for the expedited procedure it calls for, NAB said that in permitting renewal or assignment applicants to raise preliminary objections to a petition, the commission would avoid wasteful activity, add a degree of certainty to its procedures and lower the cost of participating in renewal and transfer proceedings.

Under NAB's proposal, the objections would be raised within, say, 10 days of the filing of a petition, and would be based on the alleged failure of the petitioner to comply with the standards called for in the law.
