

HOWIE WING is just twenty-one and his whole life is bound up in aviation. After a flying-course at Randolph Field, in Texas, under the instruction of Captain Harvey, he flew with Harvey in the service of a South American line. Howie hasn't a pilot's license, but is a junior pilot. William Janney plays the role of Howie

DONNA CAVENDISH (Mary Parker) isn't as yet Howie's full-grown heart-interest, but she has been taking moonlight flights with him, and it probably won't be long before she is. Donna wants to be a stewardess on a clipper ship, but can't, as she isn't a registered nurse. Her job is to please women passengers on the planes

CAPTAIN HARVEY is considered the best pilot in the business. A World War flyer, he got a job with commercial airlines in the days when aviation was risky business. Most of his pals were killed in crack-ups. When airmail started, Harvey went back into the army to fly the mail. Neill O'Malley plays the role of Captain Harvey

TYPHOON is nearing his half-century birthday, but he's still tops as a mechanic. He served under Harvey in the War, and has stuck closer than a brother ever since, even though the captain has tried to shake him off. He's a new character in "Howie Wing," and furnishes the comedy relief in the show. It's Robert Strauss' part

ZERO SMITH (played by John Griggs) has earned the reputation of being one of the best tough-weather pilots of all time. A disagreeable cuss, everybody hates him. Howie suspects Zero's trying to get data for a rival airline

BURTON YORK, the villain of the piece, goes on the test flight of the forty-ton clipper under pretense of being a representative of the company that has insured the ship. Howie thinks he is a phony. Raymond Bramley plays York
